The importance of the AMPK/SIRT1 signal is in its regulatory role in protecting the human brain from ischemic insult. The effects of AMPK signaling may be by two mechanisms: AMPK activation has been shown to activate a nuclear factor Nrf2 (Sheng et al., [@B67]), which is a key molecule in the resistance to oxidative injury of the brain. Nrf2 is a nuclear transcription factor which is essential to protect neurons from oxidative damage (Platten et al., [@B51]; Brown et al., [@B8]).

Activation of AMPK has been found to up-regulate Nrf2 activity. Under physiological conditions, Nrf2 is located in the cytoplasm bound with Keap1. Under oxidative stress condition, Nrf2 is released and translocates into the nucleus, where it binds with antioxidant response elements. Knockdown of Nrf2 can reduce the activation of AMPK by an increase in AMP/ATP ratio, and limit protection to the brain after IR injury (Han et al., [@B25]). In addition, activation of AMPK by AICAR reduced infarct size in primary cultured cortical neurons by inhibiting the activity of glyc
