For more information, please contact us at In an interview with the CNET, Chris Zacharias, director of developer advocacy for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, noted that Apple stands to benefit from the new law as it has an already-rapid rollout of the new photo features in Apple products. "If you look at the fact that Apple has announced two years ahead of schedule these kinds of features that can only be found in services like iPhoto, that's not just good for iPhoto, that's good for Apple's operating system and [their] devices," Zacharias told CNET. The law, which has already been signed by President Barack Obama, is set to go into effect on July 1. By expanding privacy rights, the bill allows consumers to opt out of being tracked online and to have their information not collected. Apple plans to release a new feature called Family Sharing in the near future that will allow people to share iTunes content, Apple Music and iCloud storage to up to six of their friends and family members. The new feature was also mentioned in the company's first-quarter earnings report that it posted on its website last week. Zacharias explained that the new feature is a result of the law passing and the fact that Apple's chief competitor, Google, has also rolled out its own feature called Family Photos that allows users to share photos with their friends and family without going through Google Photos. Family Sharing, however, will be available through the iCloud service, whereas Family Photos is uploaded to Google's photo-sharing service. Apple opted not to upload the photos onto iCloud, which included the photos' metadata. When the new law passed, it also opened the door for Apple to release a new iOS feature that is meant to protect users' privacy, according to the Electronic Frontier Foundation. The feature, called Screen Time, gives parents the ability to limit their children's activity time to prevent them from interacting with their devices or apps. Tim
